

Civil Services in the EU of 27

Reform Outcomes and the Future
of the Civil Service

Christoph Demmke / Timo Moilanen

PETER LANG

CONTENTS

I. INTRODUCTION	1
II. METHODOLOGY	7
1. Challenges in identifying comparative public administration models	7
2. Comparative approach	14
III. THEORIES OF REFORM AND CHANGE PROCESSES	17
1. Where is the reform process in the national civil services leading?	17
2. From bureaucratic role models to post-bureaucratic differentiation	21
3. From monolithic concept to multiple providers	31
4. Is public service reform a rational process?	33
4.1. Obstacles to a rational reform	33
4.2. The relationship between civil service reform and politics	36
4.3. How can you change what you cannot see? People, emotions and limitations of reforms	39
IV. DEFINITION OF CIVIL SERVICE	45
1. Public administration, public service and civil service	45
2. Civil service	51
2.1. The public law status and the constitutional role of civil servants	51
2.2. Definitions of civil services in national law	55
2.3. Civil servants and the allocation of specific state tasks	60
2.4. Specific duties and obligations	66
3. Civil servants and other public employees	69
3.1. Distinction between civil servants and other public employees	69
3.2. Civil service employment - which sectors employ civil servants?	79
3.3. The size of the civil service and public employment	88
4. Specific organisational structures	91
5. Specific working conditions	96
6. Public service motivation and different values	103
V. ORGANISATIONAL AND HR REFORM TRENDS	113
1. Reform trends and reform priorities	113
1.1. The reform of administrative law and the importance of principles of good administration	116
1.2. Civil services between de-regulation and re-regulation	119
1.3. The new importance of administrative principles	120
1.4. Too many rules and burdens? The challenges of deregulation	123
2. Performance management	127
2.1. Are the public services functioning so badly? Why is performance management so popular?	134
2.2. Comparative work in the field of performance management	137

3. Alignment – reducing differences in working conditions and employment patterns	139
4. Decentralisation	141
4.1. Is there a ‘new’ decentralised model superseding the ‘old’ hierarchical bureaucracy?	147
4.2. The importance of context: administrative traditions and HR systems	150
5. Increasing responsibility	151
6. Increasing flexibility	156
7. From closed to open systems: reforming organisational structures	160
7.1. The reform of recruitment systems	160
7.2. The change in recruitment policies	166
7.3. Conclusions	170
8. Other reform policies	172
8.1 Reforming job security	172
8.2 Remuneration systems: from seniority-based to performance-related pay	177
9. Reform overview: from traditional bureaucracy to post-bureaucracy?	187
VI. EVALUATING REFORM OUTCOMES	191
1. The employment of public employees: growing inconsistencies	191
2. HR reforms and outcomes: successes and failures	201
3. Changing public services and the perception of change	206
4. Public pay versus private pay	209
5. Positive trends in public service reforms	211
6. Successes and failures in selected HR policies	214
6.1. Positive features	214
6.2. Negative developments	217
7. Successes and failures in various administrative contexts	220
VII. FUTURE OF THE CIVIL SERVICE – DO WE STILL NEED CIVIL SERVANTS?	221
1. Introduction	221
1.1. Arguments for differences between civil servants and other employees	221
1.2. Civil servant as a dying species?	224
2. What if statutory civil servants were abolished?	229
VIII. CONCLUSIONS	243
1. Towards a better theoretical understanding of change processes	243
2. The need for better country clusters	245
3. The future of the national civil services	247
IX. LITERATURE	255